The malware is triggered by a beacon that a remote bad guy sends from some server. Here's how the bad guys do it. They send you a random link to an image file. If you download this link, your browser sends a POST request to that link's web address. Their server receives that POST request and answers with an image file. The malicious image file then loads a virus into your machine. When you open the image file, the virus creates an invisible browsing window and points to some of its code elsewhere. This code includes a POST request. Unfortunately, the request is sent to your machine's IP address. So, your PC believes the request is legitimate. I know this sounds scary, but it's really not. In fact, most non-malicious or "social" images don't load their own code. Google's images don't load any JavaScript, and they load only text. Every image on Facebook is rendered in a separate browser window. The same is true on Twitter. You have no reason to be worried.
