Forty-eight American Indian schoolchildren in three Southwestern reservations were compared with an ethnically matched, urban school sample to determine compliance with the vitamin A recommendations of the Recommended Dietary Allowance (RDA). Anthropometric measurements and interviews with food diaries were used to assess nutrient intake. In general, the children complied with the vitamin A requirements, as the mean intake of retinol was two and a half times the RDA for 1-5 year olds, three times the RDA for 6-11 year olds, and three times the RDA for 12-17 year olds. Energy intake was 25% below the daily intake value set by the National Academy of Sciences as necessary for adequate growth and development. The difference between the recommended energy
