Story

A long time ago in a land far away, there lived nothing but rabbits. Unfortunately, not too many of them managed to stay alive, due to a frighteningly cruel shelter. The summer was up... the rabbits that remained in the land were just done with the cruel nights and it was time to go. The rabbit on the front door became the guardian of the land and bunny to the world. He's been doing his job like a household expert and has become a legend for being a such trustworthy guardian. But even the legends have bad days. The bunny had just renovated his home and was proud of the freshly painted white bunny with stars on its feet that stands on top of the new golden window step that was placed in front of his door. Sadly, as beautiful as it was, it turned out that the new step was treacherous as it was made of glass, from which the rabbits needed to jump to get to their destination. One of them slipped down and broke it. The bunny was crushed to death in front of the new door.

D I love the third dimension. I love it so much, in fact, that I think a modest industry could be built up around this act of mind alteration. With the right intersection of talent, the population, and the 3-D printing technology with a laser, you'd have an industry that could flood the market with this new breed of films — a species of movies with 3-D going the way the dinosaurs went. Consider the already popular 3-D films and move them into high-definition discs. I'm talking about superhero flicks, JJ Abrams's Mission: Impossible III, and Jimmy Neutron: Boy Genius (if that's the name on the logo). We should applaud some of the best filmmakers in Hollywood for doing these films over and over again, and we should anticipate many more to come. Now just keep the size of the 3-D glasses in proportion to the movies. You want a couple of toddler-size ones because they'll be proportionately massive. You want big ones because they'll be proportionately kid-sized. You see, this is what comes with the trend. We keep talking about changing our brains, but any brain altering technology will force us to occasionally alter our experience of watching things. That's the only way we can call such films "3-D" It's something we haven't really thought about until now. We see them as gadgets or hobby activities, only mildly interesting or sometimes even downright annoying. But we'll be talking 3-D movies in terms of our 3-D glasses. Arguably, the brain-altering "3-D" — the 3-D film, anyway — is an introduction. An explanation. It is a subtle indicator of how we're becoming more than humans. For the most part, we just don't see ourselves as someone who would read books, or watch anything, in 3-D. But we will begin moving through time, with mini-films designed as explanations. The very same logos they're using for Fox and Paramount and CBS now, as they distribute through Blockbuster, will be used to promote HBO, Starz, Adult Cinemax, and Showtime. In a world like this, I don't think we quite know how to feel about this madness. It's still weird that sports movies and sitcoms don't do 3-D. I've no clue why that is, but the truth is that those things are being slowly replaced by 3-
