Melanoma is one of the most aggressive skin cancers with a high rate of metastasis. Progress in identifying new molecular targets is an essential step to overcome disease. Melanoma cells are challenging to grow in cell cultures, as the proteins that mediate cell cycle control and apoptosis are known to be functionally defective. We have generated a collection of melanoma cell lines with a combination of features representative of the different subtypes and stages of disease. Proteome analysis and gene expression profiling reveal a reproducible pattern of protein expression in the cell lines and show common expression patterns of molecular targets in matched primary tumor samples as compared with cell line samples. We have validated a number of molecular targets, including ERK, RSK, RalGDS and Retinoblastoma, by specific small interfering RNA (siRNA) technology and Western blot analysis. We conclude that the cell lines and the tumors can be a useful tool for the identification and validation of proteins regulating melanoma cell proliferation and survival and for the analysis of the efficacy of candidate molecular targets.Q: When is it correct to use the word "verify"? I used to be adamant about using the word "verify" when referring to cryptographic verifications like the property of the MD2 and MD4 hash functions. I recently decided to watch a youtube video from the Bouncy Castle crypto library which clearly mentioned that they use "verify" as a synonym for "hash". Now I am confused because from my understanding of the internet, most people define "verify" differently. In my research, I found that they define it as "deciding whether a given string is a member of a set." Yet in the Bouncy Castle web page, this definition is not present, and in the only example of the word they use the word in a
