In fact, it is the most time-tested system of preserving vegetables that exists. The vegetables are grown on the windowsill, and each lot is determined by time. They are grown in a glass-walled room that has a heavy roof and a single window. The window is open all the year round, giving us the best sunshine for the vegetables, as Kashmir has no latitude. Some traditional methods to maintain the plants, given by our grandparents, are: Flatten the soil before placing the plant. Sprinkle with rock salt before planting. Add only the water that falls from the roof, not from outside. Cover the soil with a thin layer of mud and let it dry before planting. Take care to ensure that the vegetables are not washed with water that is not very clean. Whenever they think that the vegetables have had enough water, they change the roof for a clean one. All the vegetables are planted in a group and have their own protection. The groups are cared for in the same manner. The small white flowers of the Tithi/Sidhar are not allowed to pollinate the plants as they might need too much water. When the blossoms mature, they are removed from the plants. The first group (the first plants) of the season are never touched. The vegetables, after having been planted, are not touched or moved for a year and a half. During this period, the plants are never watered or fed. A special place is kept for the vegetables which are not in need of immediate protection. These are watered and fed regularly and treated in other ways to satisfy their requirement. The traditional system of nurturing the plants is the result of extensive research, carried out over centuries. It was written by Eihan Galstad. Downloads: 890. On Monday, the MPAA slapped a massive lawsuit against Google, alleging that the search engine is in violation of copyright law. According to the MPAA, Google knowingly lets users download or stream movies without authorization and therefore should pay hefty damages for each movie watched or downloaded through its platform. The lawsuit is based on Section 1201 of the DMCA, which requires online service providers to actively monitor and prevent the sharing of copyrighted material. The MPAA contends that movies have to be blocked from any service that allows for content to be watched or downloaded. When watching a movie on the service, the movie is supposed to be "associated" with the account of the user. Under the DMCA, the service provider has to actively check if the content is being shared. If it is being shared, the provider is supposed to issue takedown notices if it is an authorized content holder, or stop hosting the content if it is not. The MPAA says Google and Netflix are in violation of Section 1201 because they neither actively monitor nor actively remove copyrighted material. Instead, Google hosts the content and allows its users to download or stream the movies. Netflix has similar rules and encourages its users to download or stream movies. Both use the "three strikes" rule to identify and remove the movies that have been downloaded or streamed without proper permissions. In the lawsuit, the MPAA asked for three years of "statutory damages," which could be in the tens of millions of dollars. The movie studios and distributors also asked Google to pay for all those who have used the service to watch or download a movie. To make the argument that Google and Netflix are in violation of the DMCA, the MPAA points to the OSP agreement. Google and other sites agree to comply with the DMCA and the RIAA's Safe Harbor Framework. According to the agreement, search engines have to remove content as soon as a Content ID match is found. However, the MPAA says that Google 595f342e71
