I've been playing this on Android and it runs well, but the graphics are kinda poor. The only reason I posted was because I was almost finished with the game. I could see a different graphic set up running on ICS June 01, 2010, 5:01AM perer Quote: Originally Posted by Fatboy I've been

I want the viewer to be able to view the two columns as one screen with two buttons. I was wondering if I could achieve this with CSS. I have a header and footer. The head and foot of the page have the content. The header and footer have a thead and tbody respectively and everything that sits between the head and foot must contain two columns. Also, I'm not very experienced with CSS so I've not yet figured out how the different headings are styled. Can anyone help me with this? Thanks A: First, what you are asking for isn't possible. CSS can only style a single row in a table. You can however make a two column table by using two columns in a single table. OneTwo If you really want two columns, I would recommend using thead and tbody. , I'm not going to follow that advice because you know that what I want to say is that I have questions and I have problems and to me those two things are not the same So, for me my questions are always on things that I can solve which are the questions of my own experience. I don't care about other people's experience and I try not to get involved in already established scientific disciplines because they already have large numbers of their methods and protocols and all that and what do I know, there are already opinions about all those things, how they work etc. I'm more interested in creating my own experiences and trying c9d1549cdd

The source, which appears to be located within the boundary between two layers of Mars' atmosphere, has been labeled by the Mars Odyssey orbiter as source A, just as was done for the much more distant Earth, in order to describe its location within the atmosphere of Mars. It was first noted in February by the Mars Odyssey high-energy X-ray and Gamma-ray Spectrometer. Today, an image taken with the High Resolution Imaging Science Experiment on June 7, 2008, shows that the source moves both vertically and horizontally within the upper atmosphere of Mars as Mars rotates, and it clearly stands out from the dark and featureless region of the planet's atmosphere. "We could see the motion of the radio source directly, which is much more difficult with radio waves than with light," said Vlada Stamenkovic, imaging system scientist for the High Resolution Imaging Science Experiment on the Mars Odyssey orbiter and lead author of the science paper describing the source. "From the acceleration in the images it appears that the source is moving away from the center of Mars and into the lower part of the atmosphere, then upward, then into the upper atmosphere. The velocity is about 100 m/s." From the radio measurements taken by the spacecraft, it appears that the source is located about 650 km above the surface, within the atmosphere boundary layer at an altitude of about 70 km, where the density and velocity of the atmosphere are much less than in the lower atmosphere. This makes this radio source an excellent place for researchers to look for martian radio emissions in the 60 to 120 GHz region of the radio spectrum. The motion of the source within Mars' atmosphere was detected from images taken with the High Resolution Imaging Science Experiment on June 7, 2008, and an image taken on June 8, 2008, shows the source moving even faster and further away from the center of the planet. Building for the Future Connect Inner City Soccer Club are rebuilding and rebuilding from the best. For decades Inner City Soccer Club have been viewed as the sport's dominant club, not only in the city but throughout the country. The coaching staff have guided the club to four national titles and eight local/state titles during their 45 year history and the strength and quality of the team has a 25 year legacy in the club. What the club needs as much as the team to perform to a higher level is better facilities. The club facilities are aging, moldy and are in need of a facelift. The facilities feel like they are on the decline; the building needs to be renovated. It is common for other soccer clubs to be renovating facilities and the historical nature of the club complicates the process. At its recent meeting, the Board of Directors surveyed the needs of the club to see if it was appropriate to initiate an asset transfer and the survey identified the Need to Upgrade Facilities as number 1 on the list of Needs. At the core of the need for updating the facilities is the location of the facility, City Square, is so congested with businesses and residential density that the space where the facilities would be located is currently not accessible. In response to the survey, Inner City Soccer Club agreed to sell the City Square facilities to the City of Seattle for $3.2M and use the proceeds to renovate the City Square facilities. City Square is one of the busiest commercial corridors in Seattle, located in downtown and a growing core of activity. The City Square location is critical as it is ground zero for the turning points of commercial and residential development moving into the downtown core from Belltown to Denny Triangle. The City Square location is also the central location for an active bus network, free public transportation, large ground-level retail openings with good visibility and other services. Soccer facilities located outside the center of the City Square network has weak access into the center of the area. City Square is a vital asset to the downtown area, so the Board of Directors commends Mayor Ed Murray for his determination in ensuring the City Square facilities are preserved. Thank you to our city leaders, permitting the purchase and the opportunity to update the facilities in City Square are now safely a part of our future. IcSC played a significant role in getting City Square approved for development and the decision to establish the City Square Soccer Club to provide recreational opportunities of soccer in the core market
