Nine Type I diabetic patients who had willfully discontinued insulin or insulin-dextrose therapy for periods ranging from 10 days to 2 months were interviewed. The patients were typical of those who reject insulin: most were female, white, middle-aged, well-educated, nonobese, with no history of psychiatric illness, and free of signs of diabetes-associated complications. Concomitant evidence of the patients' rejection of insulin included failure to maintain a normal body weight, irregularity of meal timing, generally suboptimal metabolic control, and potential imminence of diabetic complications. The patients believed that insulin therapy was causing an intolerable burden, including side effects, drug reactions, poor nutrition, and weight gain. This belief seemed to motivate their rejection of insulin. The patients' attitudes toward diabetes treatment appeared to be not merely negative but also intrinsically motivated; hence, it seems unlikely that the patients would have abandoned their dietary management without a powerful extrinsic motivational factor.Jungnathpooja Desai Jungnathpooja Desai (1895–1976) was an Indian politician.
