Even though I like the idea of an automatic white balance of a picture being directly calculated, the process isn't as fast or accurate as I would like. There is still a 30 second delay while waiting for the results. While the results are being calculated, another 30 seconds is needed for the changes to take effect. Another thing I dislike is the fact that the image may only be displayed in the right or left profile after white balance is altered. For example, if you are enlarging an image, the whites are often blown out and not as bright as they should be. This is one of those things that you just can't avoid. I don't say this right now as a criticism against Lightroom but I can all but guarantee that Adobe will be introducing these types of issues to Lightroom in the future. Payables is the vendor- and solution-neutral reference management system from Corbis. The latest version includes an improved module for content creation. So when handoff mode rolled out of the recently released 2019 version, I was excited. But had I expected the new features to be so major?

Adobe Photoshop has just got better and better, as it approaches its 10th birthday. But those who are using Elements version 4 will be glad of one new feature. Version 5 will remove the old scroll bars where you could drag Photoshop elements to change their scale and position. That's gone, in a new tool called Smart Guides. As any designer will tell you, it is vital to have something within your design that sticks to an area, as a guideline. Otherwise it can scrawl all over the page and make it more difficult to read. Sure, you can do layouts with lines of text on a white background—but you don't usually make your text that size, do you? The solution is to use Photoshop's unusual new Smart Guides. They are not boundless lines, but slight dotted lines. You can set the Smart Guides to any size and adjust their position using the same familiar tools. And the best thing about the Smart Guides? You don't need to start at the edges of a document area—you can drag it into the middle of the image.
