The veridical reference was calculated as the median in the central 500 ms window of the Perceptual Target Data from each trial type. Importantly, we note that this means that the stimuli given to the SimDriver were the non-biological virtual stimuli, but not the static images or the scrambled images, which were used for the Perceptual Target Data. The analysis of Model Variables was performed in an identical manner to the case of the Brain Imaging Data. We compared to the SimDriver the absolute and normalized amounts of difference of the Target and the SimDriver (absolute disparity;  $[\text{abs}]$ , and relative differences;  $[\text{rel}]$ , defined as the difference from the SimDriver divided by the range). A positive value indicates that the individual data point was more similar to the SimDriver compared to the Target. In a similar fashion as the Brain Imaging Data, we performed the same analyses using data obtained from a control simulation (control simulations). These analyses were performed for each trial type separately and for the ten participants separately. These analyses were performed using Matlab (R2013b). Attention task {#Sec17} ----- The second part of the study included an attention task 79a2804d6b
