Immunohistochemical studies on the microglial cell lineage have been technically challenging, due to the difficulties of identifying microglia in tissue sections. We have developed a panel of novel monoclonal antibodies that unequivocally identify microglia and macrophages in human and rodent tissues. Tissue sections are treated with the antibody cocktail, and microglia are identified by their strong positive reaction with the antibody cocktail. The effect of the electrospun fiber and fiber coating on magnetization behavior and biocompatibility of electrospun scaffolds. The biomedical use of magnetically active polymeric fiber scaffolds should be based on their ability to polarize or immobilize cells. In the present study, the magnetization behavior of biocompatible electrospun fibers, modified with magnetic and non-magnetic nanofillers and the associated biocompatibility were investigated. This was achieved by investigating the magnetic properties, biocompatibility and cell attachment of a multitude of polymeric electrospun fiber mats consisting of different ratios of Fe3O4, HPMC and Laponite. The strength of the magnetic field was adjusted so that no net magnetization was present in these fibers. Magnetic fiber mats were successfully obtained, with a magnetization range of 0.1-0.9 emu/g dry fiber. Inc 04aeff104c
