Even the technical aspects of Photoshop for the iPhone are pretty well done, especially when it comes to features. Some of them make sense in the app, and some, like “smart zoom,” frankly should have been in the first version. The app's biggest omission has to be the lack of shape layers, which are available in Photoshop CC and Adobe Lightroom. These allow you to do advanced object removal, and they win when you're dealing with more than one or two images. The feature set at the time of writing this article is in beta. As such, it is likely that some of the mentioned features are still incomplete or won't appear at all, and some of the granular details around what Adobe says it's doing with them are still up in the air. That said, it is clear that Lightroom 5 is a significant upgrade worth looking at, especially if you're using the software for the first time. The main new feature in Lightroom 5 is the panel on the left side. It shows you where most of the focus points are on your image. The left click brings a menu of related tools where you can quickly do things like straighten tilt-shift distortions, or crop images to the point where you want focus. You can also bring the gallery action of the mobile editor right into the panel. You can then, press the space bar, and select your image from the app to create a smart object for actions. Again, you will find this in the panel where you can access actions. I'm not sure how convenient of a feature it will be, but potentially you could do a bunch of this stuff in the mobile editor without touching a computer at all.
