Why People Love U2's New Album U2 is returning to the 20th century with their 11th studio album. U2 recently announced that they're releasing "Songs of Experience" later this year, which will feature 14 original songs. The band has never really strayed from the formula of their albums, so fans are curious to see what they've come up with this time. The album is the first to feature Bono on the drums for the first time since "All That You Can't Leave Behind" in 2000. He also enlisted some new producers, including Nigel Godrich (Radiohead), Flood, Flood and more. So, we thought we'd get a head start and tell you all the reasons why you may or may not love U2's new album. 1. The new album is 17 years overdue U2's last new album was "All That You Can't Leave Behind" back in 2000. But, that album was three years in the making, so it wasn't technically "new." U2 was also due to release a new album in 2017, but they scrapped it, and instead made a documentary about their 20th anniversary, with more songs coming in 2020. They also used the opportunity to announce that Bono was going to start drumming on the new album, making it 17 years. 2. Bono's not playing drums in the studio? Ever since U2 reunited in 2016, one of the big questions fans have been asking is, "When does Bono start playing drums on U2 songs?" So far, it's been
