Comparative genomic analysis of two active Streptococcus suis serotypes revealed specific associations between genome and epidemiology. Streptococcus suis is the leading cause of meningitis in pigs but causes non-life-threatening diseases in humans. This study aimed to provide a deeper understanding of the genetic determinants underlying the pathogenesis and epidemiology of S. suis, with a focus on serotype 2. A draft of the S. suis serotype 2 complete genome was sequenced and a genomic comparative analysis was performed with the published serotype 7 genome. A S. suis serotype 2 population, with a prevalence of 88%, was used to identify serotyping, AMR and virulence-associated genes. Most strains carried a gene conferring resistance to erythromycin (97%), penicillin (92%) and tetracycline (66%), with strain variants in the new streptomycin/spectinomycin resistance gene strA/B. The most common virulence-associated genes carried by S. suis serotype 2 were srtA, ssa and murC. A number of genes were found to be unique for S. suis serotype 2 strains, which may have implications for their epidemiology. This study
