Adobe's design influences are visible throughout Photoshop, from the dual-purpose tool bar with Quick Access, File commands, Layer commands, and navigation tools like the directional arrow keys and font menus. The tool panel shapes are simpler and cleaner than in previous versions, and the History panel has a pretty consistent look from version to version. The basic workflow remains the same. Lightroom 5 is also the same old essentially unix-like, user-friendly workflow app that basically lets you do everything you can do in Adobe Photoshop, and does it simply and efficiently. The new app has a ton of great features that are missing from the base photoshop app, and therefore, you simply won't want to use the basic photoshop app for any real work. There's picture adjustment, there's special effects, it has a timeline, there's a tutorial, there's much more. The new version has more tools built in, more tasks, more features. It's everything that Photoshop has become, and more. You can share your products with editors so that they can see some of the work you are doing, and you can also share your workflow and techniques with other users of those products. Another useful feature is the ability to let a reviewer edit images that you are locked down against. The image-editing experience will be familiar to anyone who has used Photoshop on a Mac or other PC, but as you can see from the digital mockup, the team has given significant attention to the iPad Pro. The result is a photo app that lets you do all the things the Pros of had to do in the analog world. You've got retouching, compositing, sliders, and more in an effective and easy to use package. Admittedly, it's not perfect, but Adobe took a chance with Photoshop on the iPad and I'm happy to see them try doing something to stand out.
